ORIGINAL REPORT

In Zagreb, he was going to the registration office of the United Nations. In front of the door they were police officers. They caught him and he started to shout. Some people from the UNHCR office went out, the staff started to talk to the police officers asking them to let him go inside, in order to give him the international protection. But the police pretended they wanted first to register him at the police station, and that they would have bring him back after. He stayed in jail for 14 hours. He ask to the police for food and water, but they didn't bring anything. During the night, around midnight, the croatian police moved all the refugees that had been caught from the cell into a van, and they brought them at the Serbian border. The police took his phone and powerbank, also 100 euros from one of his friend. Another of his friend get his phone back completely destroyed.
